

About Us

If you have a cat, you know that they can be picky about their food. Having my own cat inspire me to start my own food merchant that ensure a healthy lifestyle for our furr friends.

Raw food diets for cats (and dogs) have increased in popularity in recent years. Since wild cats live on raw food, many people believe that's the healthiest and most natural option for their domestic cats. This isn't necessarily the case.

What is a Raw Food Diet for Cats?

A raw food diet (RFD) usually includes raw muscle meat, organ meat and ground bones. The most common meats included in raw cat foods are chicken, fish and eggs, but other meats may also be included.

Although a raw food diet may seem to resemble the diet of a wild cat, it may not be appropriate for domestic cats, who often have a much longer life expectancy.

Are Raw Food Diets Complete & Balanced?

When choosing a cat food, it's essential to look for formulas that are complete and balanced. Although commercially prepared RFDs may be complete and balanced, the raw food you prepare at home probably won't be.

If you are considering feeding raw food, you'll need to work closely with your veterinarian to ensure your cat is getting all the nutrients she needs through both her food and supplements.

Otherwise, she'll be at a higher risk of developing nutrient deficiencies, like thiamine, which can affect nerve, brain and metabolism function, says Dr. Lobos. Nutrient deficiencies can also affect bone health and development.
